The Advantage of Blue Chips for Value Investing

The power of value investing lies in identifying companies whose stock prices don't reflect their fundamental worth or future prospects. When these companies are recognized for their fair or intrinsic value, the company's share price appreciates. Value stocks not only offer price appreciation, they also typically pay attractive dividend income. However, some value stocks trade at a discount for a reason. These stocks are called value traps. By applying value and quality factor screens to blue chip stocks, investors may be able to avoid value traps.

In constructing the Blue Chip Value Portfolio, Guggenheim analysts conduct fundamental analysis to determine a company's intrinsic value and identify undervalued stocks by focusing on solid quality metrics such as above average sales, earnings and dividend growth, high profitability, favorable cash flow, and strong competitive industry leadership. Guggenheim believes that blue chip companies are typically financially sound with strong management teams that may have the ability to weather downturns and operate profitably in various economic conditions. The Blue Chip Value Portfolio provides access to 30 quality blue chip companies that, while undervalued now, Guggenheim believes have the strength, size, and competitive position to regain their intrinsic value.
